Introduction:

Szechuan is a province in Southwest China. Its name means "four streams," because of the rivers that run through it, and the heart of it is the Szechuan or Red Basin, which goes from 2,000 feet above sea level to above 8,000 at the foot of its ring of mountains.

Protected from the polar winds by the Tsinling Mountains of the north and from the western storm belt by the Tibetan Plateau, Szechuan has a fantastic eleven-month growing season for a huge variety of crops.

But the foggy winds are penetrating and there is a high humidity and an almost constant cloud cover. From ancient times there has developed the belief that spices make the blood run faster and protect the body from the effects of the constant drizzle of rain.

That is why most Szechuan food is very spicy, and includes such a large variety of meats and vegetables. All these can be grown in the rich valley of Szechuan.
